Chapter 1 by ShatteredStoriesAuthor

John opened the letter that had been stuck to his door as he stepped into his basement apartment quickly trying to escape the October chill that had descended upon the city. The letter was gold leaved and written in a beautiful wavy script, that had an oddly feminine glisten to it, although that might have just been the sweet perfume that emanated from the letter.

The message the letter contained was actually quite simple, stating...

Chapter 2 by intellikat

YOU ARE INVITED TO A MASQUERADE.

WEAR A MASK (OBVIOUSLY).

FRIDAY 9PM

357 COBBLER ROAD

SULLY'S HOLLOW, UPSTATE

P.S. BRING YOUR HOT SISTER

Chapter 3 by Ian

As a burger flipper living in a basement apartment in the bottom of a rundown terraced house in Leicester, this came as a bit of a surprise. On the other hand, my life was definitely on an upward trend at last. Only last month, and completely out of the blue, I got an email from a real Nigerian prince, offering me $10 million in a simple bank transfer. Obviously, I had quickly agreed - $10 million is a lot of money, and I could even do very much work for it - and the money should be here in a few days. This might be a fun way to kill time until the cash comes through. I was getting bored with leafing through sports car magazines and trying to choose whether to buy a house in Chelsea, a mansion in Paris, or both.

There were a few strange things about the letter that made me think though:

1: It was all in capitals, just like the one from my new Nigerian friend. Perhaps he was planning to celebrate his freedom from the oppressive dictator that was holding him and his family? I wonder if he is going to buy a new PC keyboard without a stuck CAPS Lock key?

2: It was addressed to me, Bernard Thrumb, fast food operative, level 2 from Hogarth Terrace, Leicester, but it looked like something that would normally be opened by someone's butler.

3: I don't even have a sister.

Or do I? Time to think about a costume.

Chapter 4 by LuxCh3rry

I have to say I do look pretty stunning as a girl, come to think of it.. Isn't that a bad thing?!
